HAYYAK · FOR REVIEW

Research & Blog

The Research and Insights section, rebuilt from your note and running on the real site. Tell us if this is what you meant.

1 The menu splits into Research and Blog

“Insights” is now Research and Insights, opening to the two sections. Clicking the parent goes to Research.

2 The price indices live in Research

Research is its own page holding the ARPI Pulse reports, with its categories above the articles. Blog is the same page holding the blog categories. Which category belongs to which section is one setting per category in the admin, so moving a whole category across is not a developer job.

The cards are built from the site’s navy and the grid used on the page headers. The colour you set on a category becomes that card’s glow, its top rule and its article count.

Market Report and Price Index look alike because both are set to the same colour in the admin today.

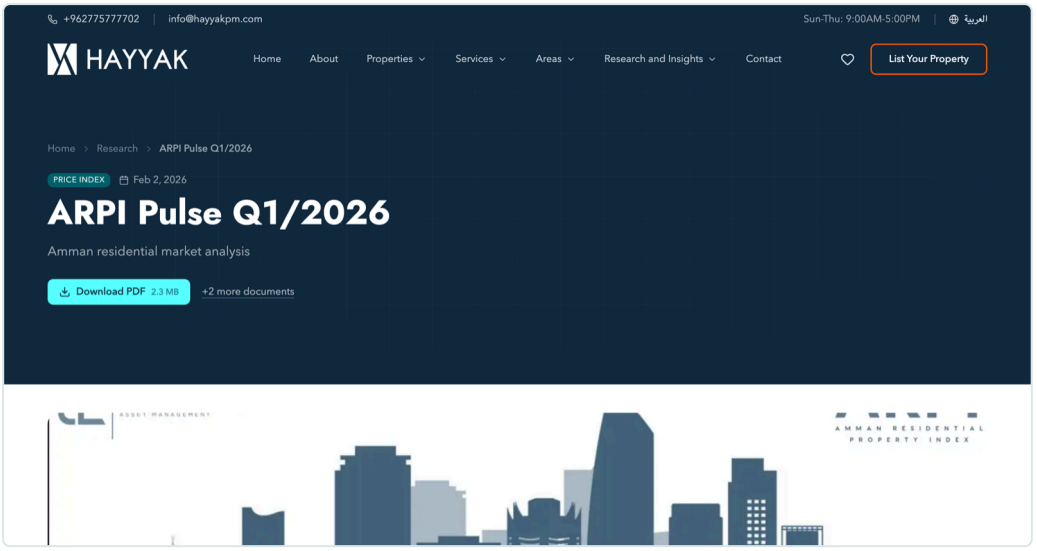

OUR JUDGEMENT CALL

We read “use something from the brand” as keeping the category colour meaningful but building the card from Hayyak navy. If you wanted the whole card filled in the category colour, say so.

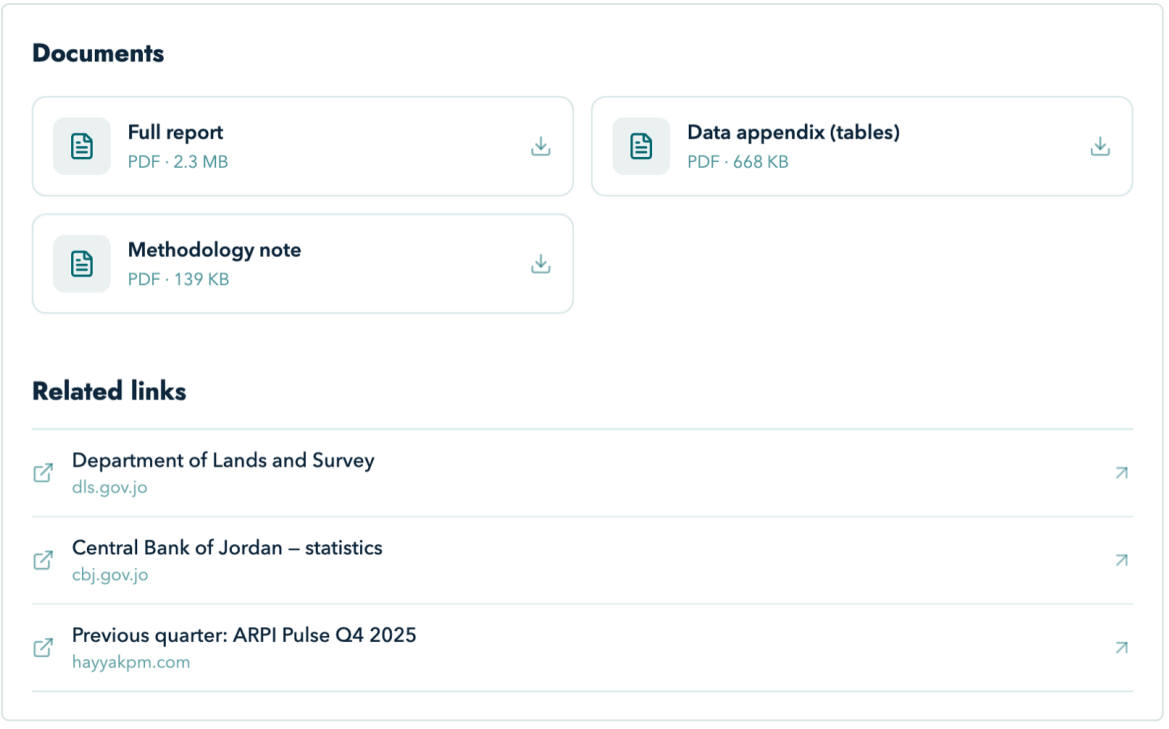

3 An article can carry several PDFs and a list of links

Today an article holds one PDF. Now it can hold as many as the report needs — the report, its data appendix, a methodology note — each named, with its size shown. One download button stays at the top so the main report is still one click away; the full list sits under the article.

Links sit under the article too, each showing where it goes. Links written inside the article text still work as before.

The top of the article.

WHAT IS STILL STAND-IN

The pages are real and running on your articles and your files. Three things in these shots are placeholders, because the admin fields do not exist yet: which category counts as Research or Blog, the extra PDF names and sizes, and the links. We built the pages first so you can judge the design before the back-end work is booked.

What we need from you

Is the card the right direction — navy with the colour as an accent, or the whole card filled in the category colour?
